extent the spokesmon of his class.

The writer examines and describes his companions under several aspects—as members of trade-unions and benefit societies, in the workshop, and at their recreation on the Saturday and Sunday. We have only space to notice briefly one or two of these. The question of strikes and their consequences has been so prominent of late that most persons will be carious to know what an intelligent and thoughtful working has to say about them, and about the trade-unions with which they are certainly so intimately connected. His remarks upon the subject are well worth attention. He gives a very interesting account of the Amalogantad.

It is that of utilizing to the utmost the labour of the members, by finding ont where there is an opening for workmen at any time. A similar plea is urged in defence of the regulation which forbids a workman to take lower wages than those current generally in the district; it is only a substitute, though a somewhat violent one, for the etiquette of the professions. On the the matter of strikes we should suspect that the "Journeyman Engineer" is rather out of sym-pathy with his fellow-workmen, unless indeed the educated minority of the working classes in general object to strikes.
